Brother, shun the mist exhaling From the fen of pride and doubt ; Neither seek the house of bondage, Walling straightened souls about, Sats! who from their narrow spy-hole, Cannot see a world without.

Trust in the wide and wondrous sea, Where the tides are fresh forever, And the mighty currents free; There, perchance, Oh! young Columbus, four New World of truth may be.

You must strive for better guerdons ; Strive to be the things you seem ; Be the thing that God hath made you-Channel for no borrowed stream. He bath lent you mind and conscience ; See you travel in their beam !

See you scale life's misty highlands By the light of living truth! And with bosom braced for labor, Breast them in your manly youth;

So when age and care have found you,

"Small thanks to you, sir, for what you said in my case," said a defendant to one of his witnesses. "Ah, sir," replied the witness, "just think of what I didn't say."

That's So.—A prodigious deal has been said for and against marriage—for and against celibacy—and the question has not yet been solved. Punch is too careful to lay hands upon such a thorny subject, but this much he does not mind saying: That it is always open to the bachelor to try marriage as soon as he discovers the error of his ways, but it is not quite so easy for a married man to turn bachelor.

other people's affairs as he does in his own, if not more. Elder Wisely, belonging to the same church, has to leave home for several weeks on business, leaving a handsome wife behind. Some days after he serted, Deacon Brown received the following note: Pogeville, July 16, 1856. Ma. BROWN. Dear Sir: I take the liberty to disclose to you some facts which have given me as much pain as they will yourself. I know, beyond all question of doubt, that a stranger very mysteriously made his appearance last night in the private parlor ars. Wisely. He was first seen there about half-past eleven o'clock; no one saw him enter the house, and up to the present hour this morning, he has not been known to depart. I think this new visitor was expected, and that he is destined to share the affecions of Mrs. Wisely. The voice of this n w comer been distinctly heard in her room, and she has en heard to address him in the tenderest and most loving the set. You not in the premises as your sense of dury a latate. My opinion is, that should Elder Wisely be seed of this stranger's advent, it might hasten his respectively.

As the Deacon read this epistle, it was a visible tremor in his hand. He polished his with a silk handkerchief, and perused it can be second werve a silk handkerchief, and perused it continue. But Descon Brown was not the mar from dury, though it led him where he would. In a moment he was resolved. Putting the le and buttoning his coat to the chir stened down to his hardware store, and whist ing to a confidential clerk, he struck his cane very dedly on the pave, greeted no one with his usual od-morning," but seeming absorbed in the contemplation of a great purpose. Arriving at the scene of his triumph, he stationed his clerk in front of the house, and giving his bell-knob a cautious pull, was soon admitted by the servant girl. The following dialogue then and there took place:

"Is Mrs. Wisely in?" "Yes, sir: she's in bed, sir."

The Deacon here examined his watch, and muttered, "half-past seven!" He then added:
"How long before Mrs. Wisely will rise, mam?"

"Well, really, sir, I can't tell; won't you take a

"No, thank you—can't stay. Did Mrs. Wisely have company last night, mam?"

"Yes, sir; I believe she did, sir; she—she—"
Here the girl blushed, hesitated, and striving to conceal her emba rassment, showed too plainly that she would evade the true evaluation the would evade the true explanation. The Deacon interposed, as it to relieve her; and

"Yes, sir, I believe he is, sir." "Is that young gentleman in the house now,

"Will you be so kind as to state in what part of the house?"

"He is in Mrs. Wisely's bedroom, sir."

The descon's manner had by this time become really excited, and he gasped out:

"Can it be! can it be?"

The maid, failing to comprehend the Deacon, in-

"Can what be!"

The old generman seemed, as the phrase is, thunder-struck. It was, for once in his life, favored with a lacid interval and he saw by the light of it that he was mild. Saying that "Mrs. Brown would be over in the course of the Mry," he took his leave, without subjecting the secrant to any cross examination. The joke got out in ine time, and we fare the descon asser quite forgare the writer of that anonymous latter. He has, however, consented to the "atranger" having a share in Mrs. Wisely's love.
